A MAN'S WORLD

CITY Junior High had started off being a boys' school, but the little town of Saybrook had expanded so during the war that girls were finally admitted through the gates. Joe Dooley and his friends stood just outside those same portals grumbling to themselves as they watched the crowd of mixed students parading up the steps to go to classes.

"It wouldn't be so bad if they minded their own business," Joe told the group indignantly. "But they went and signed up for the shop courses too."

The handful of boys all glowered at the girls and muttered some more. When they heard the last bell they climbed the steps reluctantly and fell in line to go to their classes. All of them were in the same section of the ninth grade, and went to their rooms together. While they waited to march inside, Roger nudged Joe and pointed toward a knot of girls buzzing excitedly. One was more jubilant than the rest.

"See, she's the one I told you about before. She went and won the prize for the best project in metal shop. Gosh, a fellow doesn't stand a chance any more. I looked over some of the other girls' work and it's all better than ours."

"Yeah, that's because they stay after school and do things. We never have time," Joe said.

"We gotta do something or those girls will make us look awfully silly." The groups marched off then and they had no further time to talk until they reached their first class. Both Joe and Roger had selected model sailboats as their projects, whereas the girls had all chosen something tricky to devote their time to. It was while Joe was sanding down his hull that the idea hit him. He could hardly contain himself until the end of the class.

When the bell rang, the students shelved their projects, put their tools away and filed out. When they reached the study room, Joe called the group together. "Listen," he said, "I have a swell idea. Now all we have to do is this . . ."

They talked in low voices a few minutes and grins broke out on their faces. Then Roger asked, "Yeah, but who's gonna go see the principal about it? You know him! He'll chew your head off for nothing."

Joe took a deep breath. All eyes were on him. "Okay," he growled, "I'll see him. You guys stand by to catch me if I get tossed out." Followed by the others, Joe made his way to the office. It was the hardest job he had ever undertaken. When he reached the frosted glass door marked 'Principal,' he shuddered, but Roger gave him a push and he turned the knob and walked in.

The rest of the boys stood outside. Any second they expected to hear an angry roar, but it never came. Instead there were a few hearty laughs from inside and the boys looked at each other amazed. What could have happened to Joe? Just when they were getting worried the door opened and Joe walked out. "We're in, fellows," he grinned.

For a few minutes they fired a hundred questions at Joe, but all he would say was, "Huh, he's not such a bad guy after all!" They still had fifteen minutes before going to class, so they walked into a large room in the basement and saw the teacher. When they finished telling her what the principal had said, she asked them if they were sure they would go through with it. Every head nodded as one.

"In that case," she told them, "you can begin right now. I'll take care of your program to fit this class in." A little later, when the bell rang, twenty girls marched into the room. Their eyes widened, then a low titter filled the room, for the sight of five boys sitting in a cooking class really was something!

The boys heard the laugh and turned beet-red, but their minds were made up and they were sticking to their guns. The teacher rapped for quiet and the girls donned aprons. Several of them offered spare ones to the boys as a joke, but the joke was on them, for the fellows accepted!

When the class was ready to start, the teacher explained that since there were girls in boys' classes, it might just as well be the other way around and the boys were not to have foolish remarks thrown at them. "Especially," she added, "since all the famous chefs in the big hotels are men."

That quieted the girls somewhat and the class went to work. Because the boys started a little late, she took some extra pains to explain all the essentials to them. With their desks loaded with pots and pans, they opened their cook books and proceeded to whip up some kitchen delicacies.

By the time school ended, word had been passed to every student of what had happened. At three o'clock, the boys came down the stairs with the good-natured jeers of their friends ringing in their ears, but they had already found a way to silence them. Each boy opened a paper bag and let the delicious odor of freshly baked pastry drift to sensitive nostrils.

The crowd stared. They edged over and watched while the boys bit into tasty pieces of cake. One of them couldn't stand it and asked for a piece. That started the rush. Each one of those who made wisecracks previously were all enthused now. It was hard to believe that one of their own gang could make things like that. When the final plan was explained to them they let out a shout and laughed heartily. It would be a good trick if it could be done.

Every day the principal dropped in on the cooking class to see how the boys were getting along. He really didn't think they would stick it out, but they were. Toward the end of the term, the teacher called for quiet. "Students," she said, "this week every class will submit samples to the Project Contest to be held Friday. You can work separately, or in groups. Choose whatever you wish to enter, and good luck to you all."

It was here, just what the boys had been aiming for. Like the girls, they gathered in a group and made their plans. "You, Roger," Joe said, "will make the icing, since that's what you are best at. Tommy and I will make the batter for our super cake. Spud and Tim will make the design and take care of the baking. Everybody all set?"

The boys acknowledged with a grin and got to work. Their project was to be a triple layer cake, designed like a model of the school and richly studded with fresh fruit. They took great pains in laying the foundations of it, each adding his own particular specialty. It was baked in secret after school and carried to the contest room and covered with a cloth.

Friday morning was a big day. Everyone was eager to hear the results of the contest. No project had a name on it, so the judging was impartial. Later in the auditorium, Mr. Bevin, the principal, spoke to the assembly. "My friends, it was quite a job to pick the winners of the Project Contest since you all turned in such wonderful work. As I call off the numbers of the project, will the owners please come to the stage to be awarded their prize."

He read off the numbers slowly, and the stage filled up. When the winners of the metalwork and woodwork entries took their places, there was a groan from the fellows, for all the winners were girls! Then Mr. Bevin continued. "And last, the cooking award. This was the toughest job of all since I had to taste every entry, but the winner was obvious. Number twenty-one!" The assembly was quiet . . . then the girls let out a shriek of anguish . . . they had been beaten at their own game! Climbing the stage, and wearing grins a mile long were the five boys . . . champion cooks of the school!
